SuperOprah's network has threatened to sue Oprah over a video game show that they say her production company is trying to put on during the lockdown is "contrary to regulations" that could lead to public health crises. The suit was filed in the Northern District of California on Wednesday by Harpo Productions and Warner Brothers, accusing the project of inciting "high levels of anxiety" among the general public and violating the restrictions imposed by the federal government after the coronavirus outbreak began. The "Christian Game Show" is being broadcast on OWN, a network that does not fall under the Federal

Communications Commission's national broadcast regulations and must self-censor its content for the safety of the public. The show is hosted by Rochelle Tafdros, CEO of White Rabbit Media, which says it created the game show "to help people overcome their religious and social fears and to provide an outlet of encouragement and acceptance for those who are suffering or frightened by the current pandemic." "The intent of the show is to reinforce the many, if not all, biblical passages on the subject of fear," Tafdros said. "It is NOT meant to be offensive. It is meant to be uplifting and empowering. It is meant to be a positive experience for everyone who watches it." The suit claims that the production company's video game attempts to "change the way people think about the coronavirus pandemic and how to best handle it" and that it has involved the use of actors
