Age-related differences in the normal appearance of the human optic nerve head and the peripapillary retina have been well documented. A morphometric examination of the retinal nerve fiber layer (RNFL) could enable the identification of any subtle differences in this early, still developing structure in a population of healthy children and adolescents. The purpose of this study is to assess the normative appearance of the RNFL in children and young adults in a population-based setting. A population-based cross-sectional study was performed. Our study consisted of a cross-sectional cohort of 1,285 children (?18 years old) and adolescents (ages 18-45 years old) and 1,427 adults (?45 years old). All patients underwent slit-lamp examination and were examined with the Nerve Fiber Analyzer (NFA). The average of the mean RNFL thickness measurements of both eyes for each patient was recorded. The effect of age and gender on RNFL thickness was calculated. A normal Gaussian distribution was found for all measurements. Measurements were lower for children and adolescents ($20.8 \pm 2.5 \text{ ?m}$) compared with adults ($24.2 \pm 1.9 \text{ ?m}$), which was significant in multivariate analysis. For children and adolescents, values were significantly lower in the temporal quadrant compared with adults. No significant differences were found between males and females. This study demonstrates a difference between children and adolescents and adults for RNFL thickness measurements. An explanation for this can only be speculated. With the number of requirements for the development of new drugs increasing, it is imperative that pharmaceutical companies practice good business practices. Facing such a dire situation, pharmaceutical companies have resorted to building an important part of their drug development pipeline with pharma in-licensing services. That's why one of the most important and interesting developments in the field of pharma in-licensing is the licensing of innovative medicinal products by the large
